

Creating workplaces where people want to be

Introduction for Beth Henry

Take a look around your workplace. For the first time in history, you will see the faces of four different generations at work. Working side by side presents challenges as each generation brings its own unique values and perspective. The co-workers wonder “Why do they do that!” and more importantly, “How are we going to work effectively through those challenges?”

Today’s speaker, Beth Henry, is a partner in Generation Works, a company that focuses on the effects of generational issues in the workplace, creating workplaces where people want to be.

Beth is a speaker and consultant in generational workplace issues certified by the nationally recognized Bridgeworks organization. She holds a master’s degree in Community Mental Health from SUNY at Buffalo, a certificate in Creative Studies from the Creative Problem Solving Institute, and is board certified in continuing education and staff development. Beth holds an adjunct faculty appointment to the Cornell University School of Industrial Labor Relations, and is a member of the National Speakers Association, the Society for Human Resource Management and the American Society of Training and Development.

Beth’s expertise on generational issues is professional and very “relative”. Home life is filled with a nostalgic Traditionalist, a peace loving Baby Boomer, a career changing Gen Xer and a few undecided independent Millennials. With sensitivity, humor and the ability to identify solutions, Beth always focuses on maximizing the assets of four different generations!

Please join Beth as she introduces you to the faces of generations in today’s workplace and strategies for successfully working together!
